“TO DISCOURSE MOST EXCELLENT MUSIC”

THE RUSHEN PARISH WEST GALLERY PLAYERS *

(1864)

The Manx Church Magazine for 1892 contained a piece that reminisced about Rushen Parish Church, and mentioned that “[t]he organ, which well maintains its excellence, was placed in the Church in November, 1864, during the incumbency of the Rev. Hugh Gill.”¹ There was, however, to be a consequence, namely that:

It superseded a violinocello, a flute, and a clarionet, on which instruments, as all the older parishioners could testify, the late Messrs Thos. Qualtrough, James Turnbull, and Edward Kneen were wont to discourse most excellent music, to the no small edification and content of the congregation.²

This was soon to be a familiar outcome of the installation of an organ or harmonium, with the services of individuals such as Thomas Qualtrough and others then to be dispensed with. The musical life of the parish church was reduced as a result and individuals lost a space in which they could demonstrate their musical skill to their fellow parishioners and worshippers. The tone of the piece shows that the writer too felt the loss of their contribution to the musical life of the church.³

As regards the musicians mentioned here, two of them can be identified for certain as there is no one else with their names in Rushen in the census for 1861. As regards Thomas Qualtrough, there is a choice of three individuals, as can be seen below. The Parish Clerk and Schoolmaster was yet another Thomas Qualtrough, aged 50, and living at Ballakilley, Rushen.⁴ As parish clerk, it was his role to lead the singing and so not to be found playing in the parish orchestra. He was at that time elected by the parishioners of the parish themselves, later it was down to just the vicar or rector and the church wardens, and the post was eventually abolished and replaced by the office of sexton.
